Not many people are aware of the financial implications of a cross-border move. Yet, it can have a long-term impact on their financial well being.

AMERICANS RESIDING IN CANADA

RETIREMENT ACCOUNTS

- Once a US citizen establishes residency in Canada they are often "fired" by their US broker and given 60 days to find a new home for their IRA or receive a check for the proceeds (subject to US taxes and potential penalties and fees).
- Cross-border specialists are able to facilitate rollovers to IRA and 401K accounts keeping the funds tax sheltered and avoiding a taxable event. There is no need to roll an IRA into an RRSP.
- Since RRSP contribution room is based on the previous year's earned Canadian income an American relocating to Canada cannot contribute to these programs until their second year of residency.

INVESTMENT ACCOUNTS

- U.S. citizens may set up investment accounts in Canadian or US dollars. It is best to structure investment portfolios with individual securities such as stocks, bonds and US ETFs versus mutual funds to simplify tax reporting.
- Canadian Mutual Funds and ETFs are considered "passive foreign investment corporations" by the IRS. This means there is additional reporting required which means additional costs. Some Canadian mutual fund companies issue QEF reports which help with the required reporting.
- If you are repatriating to the US, you can transfer the individual stock and bond securities "in kind" - no need to sell holdings.

CANADIANS RESIDING IN THE U.S.

RETIREMENT & INVESTMENT ACCOUNTS

- With special exemptions, Canadian advisors can manage RRSP's for Canadian clients residing in the US – tax filings are required by IRS.
- Some US States do not recognize the tax treaty and RRSPs are subject to tax on income earned.
- Non-registered investment accounts cannot be held in Canada by Canadians residing in the US unless held with a US registered brokerage firm. These accounts must be managed by a US licensed advisor like Raymond James (USA) Ltd.
- Canadian dollar assets when moved to other US brokers will most often result in currency conversion to US dollars.
